NSA Presentation

On Tuesday, June 25th, in 206 Ingraham Hall at 1:30PM Professor Don Davis will lead a lecture/discussion that will take stock of the present state of “area studies” in the academy, primarily by focusing on what we mean by area and why area studies is unfairly criticized for lacking a distinctive method. A case will be made for the intellectual and ethical necessity of area studies in the university and beyond, including the critical role of language studies.

Professor Don Davis is presently Associate Professor in the Department Languages & Cultures of Asia at UW-Madison, where he researches the history of law and religion in South Asia. In the fall of this year, he will assume a new position in the Department of Asian Studies at the University of Texas at Austin.
